FARMS Preliminary Reports

The Foundation for Ancient Research and Mormon Studies (FARMS) was founded in 1979 as a clearinghouse to distribute scholarly articles focused on Latter-day Saint scripture. Within a few years, FARMS began collecting and distributing its own “Preliminary Reports.” These were said to consist of “tentative papers reflecting substantial research [that was] not yet ready for final publication.” FARMS made them available “to be critiqued and improved and to stimulate further research.”

Having since absorbed FARMS into the Willes Center for Book of Mormon Studies, the Maxwell Institute offers the FARMS Preliminary Reports here in that same spirit. Although their quality is uneven, they represent the energy and zeal of those who sought to enrich our understanding of LDS scripture.

If you possess copies of Preliminary Reports that are not included on our website, please contact us at maxwell_institute@byu.edu to help us provide the most complete collection possible.

Authority in the Book of Mosiah

Summary:

Daniel Peterson examines the book of Mosiah as an initial step in determining the overall doctrine of priesthood in the Book of Mormon. He attempts to account for every verse in the book of Mosiah that deals, either directly or indirectly, with questions of priesthood and authority. He discusses the priesthood in the small plates, the roles of priests, whether early Nephite priests were ordained, and the church in the days of Mosiah.

Authority in the Book of Mosiah

Daniel C. Peterson

It has been correctly observed that the Book of Mormon is probably the earliest published Mormon scriptural text to mention the structure and the nature of priesthood.\(^1\) An understanding of just what the book has to say about priesthood is, therefore, of some importance. It is the intention of this paper to examine a portion of the Book of Mormon text, the book of Mosiah, as an initial step in determining the overall doctrine of priesthood in the book as a whole. An attempt will be made to account for every verse in the book of Mosiah which deals, either directly or indirectly, with questions of priesthood and authority.

The book of Mosiah is a valuable starting place, because there is good reason to believe that it was the first portion of the Book of Mormon, as we now have it, to have been translated into English.\(^2\) Thus, if the Book of Mormon is one of the earliest Latter-day Saint scriptural texts to deal with the question of priesthood, the book of Mosiah may be the earliest part of the (English) Book of Mormon to do so. It is therefore an important piece of evidence for what the very earliest Latter-day Saints might have known about priesthood. Furthermore—and this is an issue to which I shall return below—the book of Mosiah has been adduced as support for positions on priesthood which, I think, are profoundly wrong. Thus, it certainly deserves close examination on this matter.

Background: Priesthood in the Small Plates

One of the most striking things about the question of priesthood in the Book of Mormon is how little the small plates of Nephi (i.e., 1 Nephi through Omni) have to say on the subject, but how abruptly this apparent lack of interest disappears when, with the book of Mosiah, we enter Mormon's abridgment of the large plates of Nephi. The term "priest," for example, according to the Reynolds Concordance, occurs 125 times in the Book of Jackson, Monte S. Nyman, Stephen D. Ricks, Charles D. Tate, Jr., and John W. Welch for their helpful comments on earlier drafts of this paper. I, of course, assume sole responsibility for my conclusions, which I merely suggest as hypotheses to be tested against the evidence of the Book of Mormon.

\(^2\) See John W. Welch and Tim Rathbone, "The Translation of the Book of Mormon: Basic Historical Information," published by the Foundation for Ancient Research and Mormon Studies, along with Stephen D. Ricks's "Joseph Smith's Means and Methods of Translating the Book of Mormon," as WRR-86.
Mormon, either by itself or in compound terms such as "priesthood" and "priestcraft." Yet only eight of those occurrences are to be found in the portions of the book preceding the book of Mosiah. That is to say that only 6.4% of the references to "priests" or "priesthood" occur in a portion of the book which constitutes approximately 27% of the length of the entire Book of Mormon—less than a quarter of the occurrences that might reasonably have been expected. This situation is even more striking when one realizes that one of those eight references occurs in Nephi's quotation from Isaiah in 2 Nephi 18:2. (If this passage is ignored, our percentage drops to 5.6%.)

How are "priests" and "priesthood" viewed in the small plates of Nephi? Our sample is perhaps too small to allow definitive judgments, but it appears that the attitude of the authors of the small plates toward priests and priesthood may not have been entirely positive. (In this regard, Nephite prophets would share the feelings of Lehi's contemporary, Jeremiah. See Jeremiah 1:18; 2:8, 26; 4:9; 5:30-31; 6:13; 13:13; 23:11, 33-34; 32:32; Lamentations 2:6; 4:13. Other prophets, as at Isaiah 24:1-6, 28:7, and Nehemiah 9:33-34, to choose just a few examples from many, made similarly disparaging comments. One need think only of Hophni and Phineas, in 1 Samuel 2-4, or of the parable of the Good Samaritan related at Luke 10, to realize how widespread in the scriptures is the notion of the evil priest.) At 2 Nephi 10:5, for example, Jacob predicts that "priestcrafts and iniquities...at Jerusalem" will lead to the crucifixion of the Savior. At 2 Nephi 26:29, Nephi defines "priestcraft" and represents the Lord as condemning it. At 2 Nephi 28:4, Nephi says that the latter days will be characterized by contentions between "priests," who will "teach with their learning, and deny the Holy Ghost, which giveth utterance."

This apparently negative attitude may perhaps reflect the unpleasant experience which Lehi and his family seem to have had with the political and ecclesiastical authorities in Jerusalem. Certainly those experiences would have been a frequent topic of conversation and teaching among Lehi's believing children. More likely, since Jacob had seen Jerusalem only in vision (1 Nephi 18:7; 2 Nephi 6:8-10) and since Nephi was prophesying (2 Nephi 25:7; 26:14; 28:1, 3), the negative attitude was actually the Lord's, reflecting his evaluation of the corruption wrought among his people in the Old World. Nevertheless, whatever may have been the attitude of the early Nephites toward the potential abuses of priesthood authority, it is clear that their earliest records contain very little positive material—indeed, very little material of any kind—on priests and priesthood.

3 Three of these very early usages are prophetic denunciations of "priestcraft." If they are deleted, the percentage drops to 3.2%.
Peterson, Authority in the Book of Mosiah

It is equally clear, however, that they did not reject the idea of priesthood as such. Nephi himself, for example, ordained his brothers Jacob and Joseph “after the manner of [God’s] holy order” (2 Nephi 6:2; cf. 2 Nephi 5:25; Jacob 1:18; also Alma 13:1, 2, 6, 8, and D&C 107:2-4). By the time two centuries had passed—if not, indeed, well before—an entire system of “prophets, and priests, and teachers” existed among the Nephites (Jarom 1:11).

In ordaining priests, Nephi was functioning as a kind of king among his people—which was, of course, precisely how they viewed him (see 2 Nephi 5:18-19, 6:2). Ordination is primarily a royal prerogative in the book of Mosiah as well, although, as we shall see, a dramatic shift on this very issue is documented toward the end of the book. This point must be clearly understood. I do not mean to say that Nephite kings somehow had the right to ordain simply because they held political rule. Instead, I wish to suggest that kingship, among the Nephites, was a priesthood calling. A survey of the evidence from the book of Mosiah and elsewhere in the Book of Mormon should serve to make this

4 Alma 6:1 and Moroni 3 make it clear that, at least in Nephite history following the close of the book of Mosiah, “priests” and “teachers” were both clearly “ordained” in a manner not unlike that practiced by Latter-day Saints today. There is no reason to suppose that things were different in the earlier periods. Indeed, it can be argued on the basis of Moroni 2:1 that Moroni 3 represents the instructions given by the resurrected Lord during his visit to the Nephites in 3 Nephi. If this is true, it is very clear that the practice of ordaining by the laying on of hands was carried across dispensations, both before and after the advent of Christ. Considering all the changes otherwise effected by the Lord’s advent, the continuity in this ordinance is rather impressive.

5 Indeed, while it lasted, legitimate Nephite kingship remained within the line of Nephi. It is clear, for example, from Mosiah 22:13 that Mosiah’s was the primary kingship, and that the kingship of the Zeniffite line was derivative and subordinate. It is interesting to note that Mosiah II ruled a people who were mostly those of Zaraphemla, a descendant of Mulek—Mulek’s royal prerogatives (see Helaman 6:10; 8:21) had been swallowed up in those of the line of Nephi (Mosiah 25:2, 13). We do not know why or how this occurred, but then we know very little about the Mulekites at all. I suspect that the explanation for this is to be found in John Sorenson’s notion of the Book of Mormon as “lineage history.” See John L. Sorenson, An Ancient American Setting for the Book of Mormon (Salt Lake City: Deseret Book and F.A.R.M.S., 1985), 50-56.

suggestion plausible, if not to prove it. Indeed, at least several of the Nephite kings—Nephi (a quasi-king; see 2 Nephi 6:2), Mosiah I (see Omni 1:12-22), Benjamin, and Mosiah II—were actually major prophets. King Benjamin appointed priests at Zarahemla (Mosiah 6:3). In the secondary Nephite kingdom which endured briefly in the land of Nephi, Zeniff exercised his right as ruler and ordained priests. It will be recalled, of course, that they were then dismissed by his son and successor, Noah. In their place, Noah ordained his own priests, who would presumably be more supportive of his lifestyle and more pliable in his hands (Mosiah 11:5). Later, when Noah’s priests were on the run, it is noteworthy that the king of the Lamanites, too, appointed them as “teachers” among his people (Mosiah 24:4-5). We must, of course, keep in mind that Amulon and his associates do not appear to have exercised priestly functions under the Lamanites. They had never really had much interest in such things, it would seem, and so their teaching among the Lamanites—Nephite language, record-keeping, and a literacy program—was entirely secular. But the Amulonites’ characteristically secularizing view of their own office should not blind us to its sacerdotal origins, any more than Noah’s abuse of his rank should blind us to its manifest priestly nature.

This notion of a priestly kingship is perhaps a bit jarring to modern readers, living in a society where church and state are kept separate as a matter of principle. However, the Nephites were not modern, and we should not be surprised to see them untouched by more modern fashions. Kingship in the Book of Mormon is very much a religious affair, much as it had been (or had been intended to be) among the Israelites of the Old World. Following his famous speech, for example, Benjamin “consecrates” his son Mosiah as his

7 It should not be so disturbing to Latter-day Saints, whose aspirations for the life to come include becoming both “priests and kings” (D&C 76:56). This eschatological ideal may partially explain why the “priest-king” has been so frequently an earthly ideal as well. Furthermore, it would seem that Christ, the true king of Israel, holds his kingship as a priesthood office.

successor (Mosiah 6:3), just as he had been “consecrated” by his own father (Mosiah 2:11).\(^9\) The very same verb, of course, is used for the ordination of priests in the Book of Mormon (at 2 Nephi 5:26, 6:2; Jacob 1:18; Mosiah 11:5, 23:17; Alma 4:4, 4:7, 5:3, 15:13, 23:4). In Noah Webster’s 1828 American Dictionary of the English Language, a marvelous resource for understanding the language Joseph Smith used to translate the Nephite record, “consecration” is “the act or ceremony of separating from a common to a sacred use, or of devoting and dedicating a person or thing to the service and worship of God, by certain rites or solemnities.”\(^10\) As examples, Webster cites “the consecration of the priests among the Israelites” and “the consecration of a bishop.”\(^11\) And, indeed, Mosiah, son of Benjamin, was not merely a secular ruler but also a “seer,” which the Book of Mormon informs us is a more exalted title, even, than that of “prophet” (Mosiah 8:13-18; 21:28; 28:16). Seership was connected with possession of certain objects, known as “interpreters” (Mosiah 8:13). So, too, Nephite kingship seems to have been connected with and even symbolized or legitimized by the possession of certain material objects.\(^12\) Thus, Nephi took the brass plates with him when he abandoned the land of Nephi, perhaps in part as a token of his legitimacy. That the Lamanites shared his perception of the importance of the plates is shown in their oft-repeated claim that, by taking them, he had “robbed them,” just as “they said that he had taken the ruling of the people out of their hands” (see Mosiah 10:15-16; cf. 2 Nephi 5:3, Alma 20:10, 13). When Benjamin transferred the kingdom to his son Mosiah, he also gave to him the brass plates, along with the plates of Nephi, the sword of Laban, \(^10\) King Benjamin, of course, thought of kingly service to his people as precisely equivalent to service to God. See Mosiah 2:16-17.

\(^11\) Any concordance of the King James Bible will illustrate the first example.

\(^12\) In the medieval Near East, the Shi'ite imams likewise preserved certain objects as emblems of their legitimacy. Ja'far al-Ṣādiq (d. A.D. 767), for example, who was the sixth imam, received not only the explicit designation, or naṣṣ, of his father, Muḥammad al-Bāqir, but, according to common report, the weapons, the books, and the scrolls of the Prophet Muhammad. These were not only valuable in their own right, but apparently were thought to contain the esoteric knowledge given by Gabriel to the Prophet, and then passed down the line of imams as their special birthright. Al-Muqtadir, one of the last 'Abbāsid caliphs to hold real political power, used the Prophet's staff and cloak as both symbols and proofs of his authority. See, for the two cases, respectively S. H. M. Jafri, Origins and Early Development of Shi'a Islam (London and New York: Longman Group, 1979), 293; and Roy P. Mottahedeh, Loyalty and Leadership in an Early Islamic Society (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1980), 186.
and the Liahona (Mosiah 1:15-16). There is, of course, undoubtedly more to the royal possession of the brass plates than simply a claim to legitimate sovereignty. Deuteronomy 17:18-20 stipulates that the Israelite king should keep with him at all times a copy of the law, that he might always keep in mind the commandments of God. But it should be clear that the Nephite monarch was more than merely the supreme secular official in a secular government.

The priestly nature of Nephite kingship is, I think, evident in certain other ways as well. God, says Benjamin, is the appointer of kings (Mosiah 2:4). Zeniffite ideology held that Nephi was chosen by God to lead his people (Mosiah 10:13). Thus, the king represents God on the earth, and his actions, when he is righteous and inspired, are God’s actions. Joseph F. Smith’s definition of “priesthood” will be recalled here: “The Priesthood in general is the authority given to man to act for God.” It is not, therefore, inconsistent for the book of Mosiah, which repeatedly speaks of kings ordaining priests and teachers, to speak also of God as the appointer of teachers (see Mosiah 2:4). Likewise, an inspired king can be said to speak for and on behalf of God, and the distinction between them means very little in this respect (see Mosiah 2:31). God and the king are correlatives, mirroring each other in their respective spheres (Mosiah 2:19)—God rules the 13 On the sword of Laban as a kind of royal heirloom, see 2 Nephi 5:14; Jacob 1:10; Words of Mormon 1:13; Mosiah 1:16. In the Hebrew Bible, the sword of Goliath was preserved as a trophy. See 1 Samuel 21:9; 22:10. Gordon Thomason’s paper, “Mosiah: The Complex Symbolism and the Symbolic Complex of Kingship in the Book of Mormon,” published by F.A.R.M.S. as Preliminary Report TSN-82, offers a number of intriguing insights on the royal trophies associated with Mosiah II.

14 Admittedly, it was the people who “conferred” the kingdom upon Limhi, the son of Noah (Mosiah 19:26), as they also seem to have done in the case of Benjamin (Mosiah 2:11). And it was Zeniff who “conferred” the throne upon one of his sons, Noah (Mosiah 10:22; 11:1)—a very unfortunate choice, as it turned out (although we know nothing of the alternatives). In Nephite kingship ideology during this period, lineage seems to be important, but there is no clear evidence that the Nephites followed a rule of primogeniture. See, together, Mosiah 27:34; 28:10; 29:2-3, 6.

15 On the other hand, Lamanite ideology saw Nephi as a usurper (Mosiah 10:14). Second Nephi 5:18-19 and 6:2, taken together, may perhaps help us understand how it could be simultaneously the choice of God and the people which made someone king. The Book of Mormon may also be argued to illustrate the law of common consent, where the Lord reveals his choice of a king and then asks the people, through his appointed servant, to sustain that revelation. See D&C 20:63-67; 26:2.

universe at large, macrocosmically, while the king rules subordinately and microcosmically over a limited portion of God’s universe.18

The Roles of Priests

The society in which the Nephite kings ruled was a temple-centered one. Soon after their arrival in the New World, members of the Lehite colony built “a temple . . . after the manner of the temple of Solomon” (2 Nephi 5:16). Important announcements were made at the temple (Mosiah 1:18; 2:5, 6). 19 This was true not only at Zarahemla, but also in the derivative society of the Zeniffite colony in the land of Nephi (Mosiah 7:17). Even the none-too-spiritual king Noah lavished money upon his temple, which was served by his chosen priests (Mosiah 11:4-5, 7, 10-11). 20 The role of Nephite priests, we are repeatedly told, was to “teach.” Specifically, they taught, or at least claimed to teach, the law of Moses (see Mosiah 12:25, 28; 18:18; 23:17; 25:21). Abinadi, of course, attacks the hypocritical priests of Noah for not having taught the law of Moses well (Mosiah 13:25-26), but there is no hint that they should not have taught it at all. They had claimed that salvation came through the law of Moses—a proposition that Abinadi condemns as a misinterpretation (contrast Mosiah 12:32 with 13:28, 32). Instead, both king Benjamin and the prophet Abinadi insist that the law of Moses had been given because the Israelites had been “stiff-necked” and resistant to a higher law, and that its chief purpose is to point forward to the coming of Christ (Mosiah 3:14-15; 13:29-31; cf. 2 Nephi 11:4; 25:24-30; Jacob 4:5; Alma 25:15; 34:14).

18 This idea is very common in hierarchical systems. It may be observed, for example, in the writings of Pseudo-Dionysius (ca. A.D. 500) among Christian thinkers, and in those of Ismā‘īlī Shi‘ism among the Muslims. Similarly, it is hardly coincidence that the various presidencies and bishoprics of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints seem to reflect the Godhead itself.

19 When Jesus Christ appears to the Nephites, he comes to them where they have gathered at the temple in the land of Bountiful (3 Nephi 11:1).

20 Rodney Turner’s suggestion, at “The Three Nephite Churches of Christ,” 122, n. 19, is attractive: “It is very likely that Zeniff restored the temple originally built by Nephi in the sixth century B.C. (2 Nephi 5:16). King Noah seems to have remodeled this same temple on a grand scale, making it far more elaborate and costly than it had previously been (Mosiah 11:10). Like Herod the Great, who remodeled the second temple (that of Zerubbabel; Ezra 3), Noah’s project was doubtless more a matter of personal vanity than genuine piety.”
At first glance, it seems striking that “priests” in Mosiah (and elsewhere in the Book of Mormon) seem only to teach. Repeated mention is made of “priests and teachers.” Could this be related to Joseph Smith’s use of the word priest for the preachers of his own day? In his 1828 dictionary, Noah Webster writes that, “In the United States, the word [priest] denotes any licensed minister of the gospel.” And this is, in fact, much the way that Joseph Smith used the term. The draft of his 1839 “History,” for example, speaks of “several learned Priests” who visited him in order to dispute his theological claims, where the context almost certainly involves Protestant preachers rather than actual Catholic or Orthodox priests. The same usage is apparent in his account of the religious disputes which preceded his first vision (see JS-H 1:6).

In other words, are the “priests” of Mosiah real priests, in the same sense as those of Levitical lineage in the Hebrew Bible? Surely, if they are really teachers of the law of Moses, we should see some evidence not merely that its moral precepts were discussed but that its sacrificial system was conveyed and put into practice. After all, we do have the temple as the spiritual (and perhaps literal) center of Nephite society, and we have some (admittedly slight) evidence for Mosaic sacrifice in the book of Mosiah (Mosiah 2:3-4; cf. 1 Nephi 5:9; Alma 34:13-14). Furthermore, a careful reading of Mosiah 1-6 offers plausible evidence that the Nephites on at least this occasion celebrated a full-fledged Mosaic Feast of Tabernacles. Incidentally, too, it offers an interesting interpretive possibility: If it is, in fact, the case that king Benjamin’s address coincided with a Nephite Feast of Tabernacles, the solemn and moving celebration of the Day of Atonement would have taken place within only the previous few days. Thus, when, at Mosiah 4:2, the people cried out for application of “the atoning blood of Christ,” it is not difficult to imagine that cry as an echo of the deeply religious season through which they were passing, as well as of the sacrifices characteristic of the feast in which they were at that very time engaged. The Nephites were, after all, a people who understood the gospel of Jesus Christ but continued to live according to the performances and ordinances of the law of Moses, a possibility allowed by Galatians 3:8 and Moses 6:54, 59-62. They had just received from their king an angelically delivered message about “the atoning blood of Christ” (Mosiah 3:11). They understood the real significance of the ordinances and rituals laid down in the Mosaic law, which were intended to point forward to Christ (2 Nephi 11:4; 25:23-26; Jacob 4:5; 7:7; Jarom 1:11; Mosiah 3:14-15; Alma 25:15-16). Their minds would thus have been directed to the coming of the Savior in a singularly powerful way by the rites of the Day of Atonement and the Feast of Tabernacles. “Significantly,” John Tvedtnes observes, “[the] law prescribes more sacrifices for Sukkot [Tabernacles] than for any of the other festivals.”

21 Actually, at least when Alma’s party arrives at Zarahemla and the church is established there, “teachers” seem also to have filled a presiding role (see Mosiah 25:20).

Clearly, as is abundantly attested throughout the Book of Mormon before the coming of Christ, the Mosaic law was practiced among the Nephites (2 Nephi 5:10; 25:24), and equally clearly, therefore, the “priests” of the Book of Mormon were really priests and not merely a nineteenth-century farm boy’s retrojection of the circuit-riding revivalist preachers of his own day into his pseudobiblical historical yarn.

The “priests and teachers” referred to throughout the Book of Mormon are often—although not always—two distinct groups, even though, undeniably, the book often attributes teaching functions to its priests. “Priests” and “teachers” are mentioned in close proximity to one another twenty-two times in the Book of Mormon, and in every instance except one “teachers” are mentioned after “priests,” suggesting that they might represent a subordinate priesthood office among the Nephites as they do in the Church today. (It is 25 Why, then, is the law of Moses so much less prominent in the Book of Mormon than it is in the Hebrew Bible? First of all, as my colleague Kent P. Jackson has reminded me, the law is really not so prominent in the Old Testament (outside of a few “priestly” writings) as one might tend to think. The apostle Paul clearly talks more about it than do Lehi’s contemporaries in Jerusalem, at least as they are represented in the prophetic books of the Bible. A further explanation is probably to be found in the fact that much of the book was edited by Mormon, who wrote several centuries after the coming of the Messiah had put an end to the sacrificial law, and who had more on his mind while preparing it for its future readers than merely antiquarian curiosity. In the small plates, not edited by Mormon, there is the intriguing reluctance to talk about “priests” and “priesthood” to which I have already alluded, and to which I shall return below. Perhaps too, and perhaps most importantly, the Book of Mormon is the record of a people who understood the subordinate and provisional role of the law of Moses, and who had among them the higher or Melchizedek priesthood. For the latter point, see Joseph Fielding Smith, Answers to Gospel Questions, vol. 1 (Salt Lake City: Deseret Book, 1957), 124-26; John A. Widtsoe, Evidences and Reconciliations: Aids to Faith in a Modern Day (Salt Lake City: Bookcraft, 1943), 188-90.

clear from Moroni 3 that the offices were distinct, at least in later Nephite practice.) This seems to be confirmed by the incident depicted in Mosiah 26:7, where the “teachers” are subordinate to the “priests” in a hierarchy consisting of teachers, priests, and Alma the Elder as “high priest.”27 (As we shall see below, Alma was here taking the place of the king, who seems to have presided over the priests in earlier Nephite usage.28)

Nephite priests seem to have served as a kind of council, to whom the king could go for counsel and advice. The second Mosiah consulted with his priests (Mosiah 27:1), as did king Noah at his own (obviously imitative) court in the land of Nephi (Mosiah 12:17).29 It is in fact the priests of Noah who advise the king, in Mosiah 17:11-12, to put their former colleague Alma to death for abandoning their unrighteous ways.

Only in Alma 4:7 do we find “teachers, and priests, and elders” (cf. Alma 6:1 for “priests and elders”), where it is clear that the offices are simply being mentioned in reverse order. See Moroni 6:1 for a listing in the conventional order.

27 Jarom 1:11 knows a hierarchy of “prophets, and priests, and teachers.”

28 According to Mosiah 11:11, king Noah had “high priests” (emphasis added). It may be that we are here referring to an office analogous to that of high priest (i.e., a priest of the higher priesthood, as opposed to a priest of the Aaronic order) in the contemporary Church, which many are able to hold simultaneously. In many other occurrences of the term “high priest” in the Book of Mormon, on the other hand, it seems likely that what is intended is rather more like—although not identical to—the high priest in ancient Israel, of whom there was normally only one at a time. (Alma the Elder, for instance, was the single high priest over the church, both when he and his people were in exile [Mosiah 23:16] and after their arrival in Zarahemla and the subsequent expansion of the church [Mosiah 26:7].) In later periods, possibly owing to the sheer size of the church and to difficulties of communication and centralization, there seem to have been regional high priests in Jershon and in Gideon (Alma 30:20-21), and very likely elsewhere—perhaps subordinated to the overall high priest, in this case Alma the Younger, resident in the capital city of Zarahemla (Alma 30:29; cf. 46:6, 38; Helaman 3:25; 3 Nephi 6:21-22, 27). Multiple “high priests” in the same location may simply have been another of king Noah’s apostate and grandiloquent innovations, which tended everywhere to exchange Nephite simplicity for the lavish and the overdone.

29 At Alma 23:16, the king of the Anti-Nephi-Lehies too consults with his priests. Whether he was carrying on Lamanite practice, or simply adopting Nephite habits as he had adopted Nephite religion, is unclear. The Book of Mormon tells us little about the Lamanites. See Sorenson, An Ancient American Setting for the Book of Mormon, 50-56.
Were Early Nephite Priests Ordained?

The case of Alma the Elder brings up an interesting question. Were these priests of Noah legitimate holders of legitimate priesthood? We have no record of any ordination for Alma other than his presumed inclusion among the priests ordained by Noah at the latter’s accession to the throne (Mosiah 11:5). Where, then, did Alma get his priesthood authority? Is it possible that he functioned as a prophet without ordination? This possibility has recently been raised. “On occasion,” one writer has argued, “certain individuals with unmediated callings are presented as not waiting for ordination before embarking upon their ministries. Ordination, therefore, is not presented as being essential either to create a church or priesthood structure where none before existed, or to preach repentance or teach the gospel, or to castigate an existing ecclesiastical or even political structure that has become rigid or corrupt.”

Among those in the Book of Mormon who are claimed to have received “unmediated callings” to priesthood authority from God are Lehi, Nephi, Samuel the Lamanite, Abinadi, Alma the Younger, and Alma the Elder. I shall examine each of these cases individually, if briefly. But first the theoretical basis for a claim of “unmediated” priesthood callings must be investigated. Alma 13:1 is invoked as evidence that “the Lord God [has] ordained priests, after his holy order” without human mediation. But it proves nothing of the sort, since the Lord acts through his designated agents and since it makes no difference whether the voice is his or that of one of his servants (D&C 1:38). We have already seen that faithful Nephites could speak of God’s appointing a king or a priest while being fully aware of the human agency through which that appointment was effected. Alma 13:4 is cited as proof that “it is the ‘Spirit of God,’ not any human being,” that calls to priesthood office.

30 Toscano, “Priesthood Concepts in the Book of Mormon,” 13. The question must be considered, because the position represented in the quotation immediately preceding is not only erroneous, but, I am firmly convinced, is fraught with immense danger for the order of the Church. Any number of ark-steadiers have come forward in the history of the Restoration, who have seen it as their right and duty to guide the Church, to wrest its leadership away from those called of the Lord to preside over it. Even at the present moment, there are those who claim that the Church is under the control of “second string” leaders—and implying none too subtly that the first string is, well, ahem, simply too modest to call itself by name.

31 See ibid., 12-13, for the presentation of the theory of “unmediated callings” and the individual cases purporting to illustrate such callings upon which I draw. It is worth mentioning here that, whatever may
But this is at best an unconvincing inference from a rather ambiguous verse. Moreover, Alma 13:8, 10, and 16 make it clear that “ordinances” were involved and that the priests were “ordained” in a manner that looked forward to the Son of God. And Mosiah 21:33-35 strongly implies that Limhi, at least, did not accept the idea of “unmediated” callings to priesthood authority.

Lehi

Regarding Lehi’s ordination, one simple observation is in order: Arguments from silence are notoriously weak, logically. The verses cited to prove that Lehi was ordained by no man (1 Nephi 1:18-20) nowhere state that Lehi was not ordained; they simply do not record that he was. However, the fact that Lehi’s ordination goes unmentioned by the Book of Mormon may be no more significant than Luke’s failure to mention the wedding of Elizabeth and Zacharias.

Nephi

Lehi’s son, Nephi, unquestionably held some kind of priesthood, since, as noted above, we have record of his having ordained Joseph and Jacob, his brothers. Yet we have no record of his own ordination. 1 Nephi 17:48-54 says nothing about it. What are we to conclude from these gaps in the Nephite chronicle? Nothing, I submit. Again, such things speak only of the vagaries of historical record keeping; they do not by any stretch of the imagination demonstrate that Nephi was not ordained to the priesthood.

Samuel the Lamanite

In the case of Samuel the Lamanite, again, we have only an argument from silence. We know little about his career except for that brief portion of it recorded in Helaman 13-16. Certainly there is no statement in the Book of Mormon which says that Samuel did not hold the priesthood. The sentiments recorded at Helaman 13:5, 7, do not even remotely hint that he had not been ordained. And, given the general silence of the Book of Mormon about the affairs of the Lamanites when they did not impinge directly upon the Nephites, we would hardly expect to hear anything about Samuel’s ordination.32 (It is significant, for our purposes, that the risen Savior later acknowledged Samuel as “my servant” [3 Nephi 23:9], confirming that Samuel was God’s authorized agent at the time he prophesied in the name of the Lord from the walls of Zarahemla.)

have been the case in early Nephite times, the manner of ordination to the priesthood was prescribed and standardized by Jesus when he appeared at Bountiful. See 3 Nephi 11; 18; Moroni 2-3.

32 Again, see Sorenson, An Ancient American Setting for the Book of Mormon, 50-56.
Abinadi

At the risk of wearisome repetitiveness, essentially the same observation must be made in the case of Abinadi: Admittedly, Mosiah 11:20 and 12:12:1-2 do not mention his ordination. But what do we know about his biography beyond his brief encounter with king Noah and the court priests? Nothing. Does our ignorance justify a declaration that he had never been ordained?

The case of Abinadi also illustrates how, when the king fails to exercise his responsibility, someone else may be called to fill his role. Abinadi speaks for the Lord, at the Lord’s command, as the king was supposed to do (Mosiah 11:20; 12:1-2; 13:6). It is because both king and priests have failed to discharge their responsibilities that Abinadi had to be sent by the Lord: “Have ye taught this people that they should observe to do all these things for to keep these commandments? I say unto you, Nay; for if ye had, the Lord would not have caused me to come forth and to prophesy evil concerning this people” (Mosiah 13:25-26; cf. 12:29).

It is not surprising, thus, that king Noah, who does not acknowledge his own neglect of his divinely ordained stewardship, demands to know “Who is Abinadi?” Who is this unauthorized person who trespasses upon my royal prerogatives and has the effrontery to declare “that I and my people should be judged of him”? But when Noah follows that question with the arrogant outburst “Who is the Lord?” it becomes painfully and obviously clear why Abinadi had to be sent (see Mosiah 11:27; emphasis added).\textsuperscript{33} Noah has broken the covenant between himself and God, which is the ultimate source of his own authority. Rather than recognizing himself as the earthly analogue of the heavenly king, he seeks to deny the authority of that heavenly king.\textsuperscript{34} Thus, when God sends Abinadi to Noah, he tells that prophet of the king’s impending death by fire, “for he shall know that I am the Lord” (Mosiah 12:3; emphasis added).\textsuperscript{35}

Alma the Younger

A rather different argument can be made in the instance of Alma the Younger. After his spectacular angelic conversion, it has been claimed, “Alma does not wait for an ordination \textsuperscript{33} Precisely the same question had been asked of Moses and Aaron by Pharaoh (Ex. 5:2; cf. Qur\textsuperscript{a}n 26:23-29), and, rhetorically, by Cain (Moses 5:16). Compare too the Rabshakeh’s speech at 2 Kings 18:35.

\textsuperscript{34} Compare the Pharaoh of Qur\textsuperscript{a}n 26:29: Having arrogantly asked Moses and Aaron just who the Lord is, he says (as I translate the Arabic), “If you take a god other than me, I will have you imprisoned!”

by any human authority.” Even here, it is possible that Alma the Younger, son of a priest, had already been ordained to some office in the priesthood by the time of his conversion. But it requires no ordination to report a spiritual experience, and this is all that Mosiah 27:32 tells us that he was doing. It is utterly incorrect, however, to cite Alma 5:44, 49, 51, as evidence for the notion that Alma the Younger claimed no authority other than a powerful conversion even at a point later in his career, for that very discourse begins with a powerful statement of his own priesthood authority, received through ordination: “I, Alma, having been consecrated by my father, Alma, to be a high priest over the church of God, he having power and authority from God to do these things” (Alma 5:3; cf. Mosiah 29:42).

Alma the Elder

Indeed, if the cases of Lehi, Nephi, Abinadi, and Samuel are relatively ambiguous, that of Alma the Elder is not ambiguous at all. He was ordained validly by Noah, who was ordained validly by his father, as discussed above. One writer on this question maintains that Mosiah 11:5 rules out any valid ordination under the hand of Noah, but it is difficult to see how that passage says anything of the sort. The fact that Noah was not righteous, and that Alma himself seems to have violated the laws of God during his early ministry, has nothing to do with Alma’s priesthood authority. Unless and until superior priesthood authority withdraws permission to exercise priestly functions, a legitimately ordained holder of the priesthood may continue to perform valid priesthood ordinances—however unrighteous he may personally be, however dead to spiritual promptings, and however unlikely it may be that he will ever actually exercise his priesthood. (As our advocate of 36 It is puzzling that Alma 5:3 and 5:44 are quoted, almost fully, on the same page, by Toscano, “Priesthood Concepts in the Book of Mormon,” 12, to illustrate Alma’s “unmediated calling.” They demonstrate precisely the opposite. Jacob 1:17 and 2:11 are likewise used to illustrate that Jacob’s calling came directly from God, but 2 Nephi 5:26, 6:2, and Jacob 1:18 record Jacob’s ordination by his brother, Nephi. Sometimes, Toscano seems merely to claim that divine guidance is needed to make priesthood holders fully effective instruments in the hands of God. This is an incontestable claim, but, unfortunately, he often wants to go beyond it.

37 See ibid., 13.

38 The ancient Christian church faced this problem in the form of the Donatist schism, which was finally declared heretical in A.D. 405. The Donatists held that unrighteousness in a bishop or priest invalidated any and all ordinances that he might have performed. However, the Synod of Arles determined in A.D. 314 that the validity of baptisms and ordinations and the like did not depend upon the worthiness or merit of the officiator. (On the Donatists, and the related Novatianist and Meletian movements, see David “unmediated callings” correctly [if somewhat inconsistently] writes elsewhere in his discussion of the subject, “worthiness is not essential for priesthood to function. If, for example, one were baptized by an unworthy priesthood bearer, the baptism would still be effectual.”)

Alma, in fact, claimed to have authority from God (Mosiah 18:13), a claim which the later editor implicitly acknowledges as valid (Mosiah 18:18). Furthermore, in the power vacuum left by the absence of king Noah, the people implored Alma to assume the royal title and prerogatives (Mosiah 23:6). He turned down the title, but, of necessity, he did carry out some kingly duties. It was Alma who ordained priests and teachers for his outcast people, among whom he was in fact the sole human source of authority (Mosiah 18:18; 23:17). Indeed, Mosiah 18:18 informs us that Alma ordained “one priest to every fifty” of his followers.

The baptisms that Alma performed required power and authority from God (Mosiah 18:17). One writer on Mormon subjects, mistakenly assuming that Alma had no valid ordination, uses the book of Mosiah as evidence that early Mormonism “placed greater

 Granted, the Christian church at this period was essentially apostate, but Latter-day Saints take basically the same position, and for good reason. If serious sin, as such, invalidated priesthood ordinances, we could never know whose marriage was legal, or who was really a member of the Church. Did the man who ordained you to the priesthood have a secret, unrepented sin? Then your ordination is invalid. Your mission was illegitimate, any converts you baptized are actually nonmembers, and you are living in adultery since you should never have been admitted to the temple. Any of your converts who served missions and baptized are similarly fraudulent, and the consequences ripple onward and outward in utterly unforeseeable ways. How could we ever be sure of anything?

40 Alma was a descendant of Nephi (Mosiah 17:2), a fact which may or may not be significant in discussing his priesthood authority since we do not know precisely how priesthood functioned or was apportioned among the Nephites. Certainly most, if not in fact all, of the priests and kings of whom we know anything in the Book of Mormon up to this point were of the lineage of Nephi.

41 This seems quite mechanical, incidentally, when contrasted with the claim by Toscano, “Priesthood Concepts in the Book of Mormon,” 10, that, in the Book of Mormon, “one’s calling in the priestly structure was determined not so much by the needs of the Church as by the personal gifts of those ordained.” Toscano has particular reference to the period following the visitation of Christ to the Americas, but it appears that he would argue similarly for the entirety of the Nephite record. His claim, which I think simply incorrect, seems to imply an oblique criticism of today’s Church.
emphasis on the charismatic, or spiritual, nature of restored authority than on its lineal or legal aspects. The exercise of authority in the [early LDS] church derived from the operation of the Holy Spirit rather than exclusively from ordination or as a function of church office. Only gradually did Mormonism’s description of . . . authority become clearly lineal-legal.”

He sees a reflection of this in the alleged fact that Alma’s authority to baptize, and even “the legal claim of authority of the priests and teachers [ordained by him] ultimately rested on Alma’s charismatic reception of authority.” However, in so interpreting the account of Alma and his people, this author has not only ignored the very real priesthood clearly possessed by Alma before the coming of Abinadi, but he has seriously misread the report of Alma’s baptismal service at the waters of Mormon. He reads Mosiah 18:12, and finds there Alma’s impassioned prayer: “O Lord, pour out thy Spirit upon thy servant, that he may do this work with holiness of heart.” Then he notices that the verse immediately following records that “the Spirit of the Lord was upon” Alma, who claimed “authority from Almighty God.” Having seen this, and having confused temporal sequence with causation, our author thereupon alleges that Alma’s authority 43 Vogel, Religious Seekers and the Advent of Mormonism, 102-3. Compare p. 104: “Authority in the early Mormon church was originally patterned on a similar model of charismatic or spiritual power, not on priesthood ordination.” By using the episode of Alma and the waters of Mormon in this way, Mr. Vogel wishes to support his contention that the angelic ordination of Oliver Cowdery and Joseph Smith to the Aaronic Priesthood came later, as an afterthought. However, if my reading of the book of Mosiah is correct, Alma and his followers, and all the complexities of lineage and priesthood which surround their story, are in fact indirect evidence that the later claims by Oliver and Joseph (echoed by Orson Pratt) that it was a concern for authority which led them to the Susquehanna river in May of 1829 are not spurious retrojections. (Welch and Rathbone, “The Translation of the Book of Mormon: Basic Historical Information,” 34, put the translation of Mosiah in April 1829, only about a month before the reception of the Aaronic Priesthood.) See Richard L. Bushman, Joseph Smith and the Beginnings of Mormonism (Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1984), 100-101, and Milton V. Backman, Jr., Eyewitness Accounts of the Restoration (Salt Lake City: Deseret Book, 1986), 107-12, for those claims.

44 For his interpretation of the material, see Vogel, Religious Seekers and the Advent of Mormonism, 102-103.
actually came through a direct answer to his prayer for “holiness of heart,” instead of through formal ordination.\footnote{This elementary logical error is most commonly known as \textit{post hoc, ergo propter hoc} (i.e., roughly, “after something, therefore because of it”). It is often illustrated with the image of a rooster who thinks his crowing causes the sun to rise each morning. Mr. Vogel might have done better to have cited Mosiah 18:26, where “strength in the Spirit” really does appear to enable men to “teach with power and authority from God” (cf. Mt. 7:28-29). The problem with this verse, for his purposes, is that the men in question are already ordained priests. And besides, to \textit{teach} “with authority” on a subject is potentially quite a different matter than simply having priesthood authority to perform an ordinance. It can be a function of knowledge, insight, experience, or spiritual sensitivity. Beyond an absolute minimum, none of those attributes (however desirable) is really necessary for the validity of a priesthood ordinance.} However, the passage in question does not require such an inference, and cannot truly be said even to suggest it. Surely priesthood holders who have never thought to question their authority, and who well remember the laying on of hands which they believe gave them that authority, can understand a prayer for the Spirit before performing an ordinance.\footnote{Alma was both a prophet and a priest, and so was especially concerned, although he had unquestionable priesthood ordination, with the spirit (or Spirit) in which he acted. The opposition of legalism and charisma, of priest and prophet, is an old cliché, and, like many old clichés, carries some truth. (In more-or-less Latter-day Saint circles, E. E. Ericksen was particularly fond of it. See Scott G. Kenney, ed., \textit{Memories and Reflections: The Autobiography of E. E. Ericksen} [Salt Lake City: Signature Books, 1987], xii, 208-9.) But it is only accidentally true, and not essentially so. (Was the Hebrew Samuel a prophet, or a priest? What of John the Baptist?) Even king Noah’s priests claimed to understand prophecy (Mosiah 12:25).} In subsequent Nephite history, the reception by ordination of authority to baptize is made absolutely clear (3 Nephi 7:25).\footnote{As it is also in the matter of the administration of the sacrament. See 3 Nephi 18:5. The passage that features ordination for authority to baptize was probably translated within, at the most, five weeks of the report of Alma and the waters of Mormon. (See Welch and Rathbone, “The Translation of the Book of Mormon: Basic Historical Information,” 34-35.) If one assumes, as I believe Mr. Vogel does, that Joseph Smith was \textit{authoring} the Book of Mormon during that period, there seems hardly enough time for a major theological (or ecclesiastical) evolution from one portion of the book to the other.}

The Church in the Days of Mosiah II

Noah’s breach of the normal order of things in Nephite kingship was to have long-lasting consequences in Nephite history. First, it helped to transform his one-time priest, Alma, into an ardent antimonarchist. “Behold,” says Alma, who draws upon divine revelation as well as upon his own experiences with Noah, “it is not expedient that we should have a king; for thus saith the Lord: Ye shall not esteem one flesh above another, or one man shall not think himself above another; therefore I say unto you it is not expedient that ye should have a king. Nevertheless, if it were possible that ye could always have just men to be your kings it would be well for you to have a king. But remember the iniquity of king Noah and his priests . . . . Trust no man to be a king over you” (Mosiah 23:7-9, 13). Alma begins his denunciation of kingship by referring to the equality of all flesh, but soon alludes to his real reason for opposing monarchy, which is that the king might well prove to be unrighteous—like his old boss, Noah. (Of course, a truly righteous king would not esteem himself to be better than others, and would not allow others to think so of him; see Mosiah 2:10-19, 26.) Later, in Zarahemla, Alma emphasized equality within the church, insisting that priests and teachers should labor for their own support rather than relying upon the surplus of others (Mosiah 27:4-5).

Another consequence of Noah’s iniquity was, in fact, the establishment of a Nephite church. It is striking that not a single reference to any “church” actually existing in the New World is to be found in the small plates of Nephi—i.e., in the portion of the Book of Mormon prior to Mosiah—while such references are quite common from Mosiah onwards. Only one actually existing “church” is referred to in the small plates at all, and that is the “church” at Jerusalem with which Laban was thought to be affiliated (1 Nephi 4:26). Laban’s link with that “church” is perhaps almost enough in itself to account for the neglect of the term throughout the small plates—a neglect broken only by occasional references, the majority of which are negative. (Similar considerations may have led to the apparent reluctance in the small plates, already discussed, to talk about priests and 48 Perhaps he recalls here the revelation he himself had received, and which is alluded to at Mosiah 18:21-29. However, the doctrine that “the Lord esteemeth all flesh in one” is attested from the earliest period of the Lehite colony (1 Nephi 17:35).

49 That Alma was quite serious about equality is shown in his insistence that his priests, both in the wilderness (Mosiah 18:24, 26) and in Zarahemla (Mosiah 27:4-5), labor to support themselves. This was in clear contrast to the practice of king Noah’s priests, among whom Alma had once been numbered (Mosiah 11:6, 14).

50 One could argue from 3 Nephi 5:13, with its reference to “the first church which was established among [the people of Alma the Elder] after their transgression,” that there must have been churches before Alma’s time. But the passage seems to me too ambiguous to allow for any very strong inferences. It could just as well mean that Alma’s was, simply, “the first church,” and that it was established after the people’s transgression (under Noah?).
priesthood. When they are mentioned, as often as not it is in the context of a warning against the evils of priestcraft—a sin which can certainly afflict, precisely, churches.) With the exception of the single reference to a Jerusalem church in Lehi’s day and another to the Jerusalem church in the time of Jesus and the apostles (2 Nephi 25:14), the only occurrences of the term church in the small plates refer either to the eschatological-apocalyptic “great and abominable church” (1 Nephi 13:4-6, 8, 26, 28, 32, 34; 14:3, 9-10, 15, 17; 22:13-14; 23; 2 Nephi 6:12; 26:20-21; 28:3, 12, 18) or, rather less commonly, to the eschatological-apocalyptic church of God (1 Nephi 14:10, 12, 14; 2 Nephi 9:2). Again, it is striking that there occurs here no mention whatever of an actually existing New World church, despite the fact that the small plates cover nearly the first five centuries of Nephite history.

Rodney Turner observes that “the Book of Mormon does not indicate the exact nature and extent of the Church, as such, among the early Nephites.”51 If I am correct, this is simply because, among the early Nephites, there was no church.52 Turner is right to argue that, in a certain sense, “the Church has been found on the earth in every gospel dispensation since the days of Adam. Although it is always founded upon the keys and powers associated with the Melchizedek Priesthood, and always embodies certain basic doctrines and ordinances, its organizational structure reflects the times and circumstances in which it is established. Thus the Church of each dispensation has had a personality all its own.”53 But he can present no evidence that anything even remotely resembling what we today would recognize as a church organization existed among the Nephites before Alma the Elder. Only with Alma do we encounter a separate “church” in the true sense of the Greek word ekklēsia. (That term, it will be recalled, originally referred, in classical Greece, to an assembly of the citizens called out by a kind of crier. It is related to the verb ekkaleō, “to call forth.” The notion of “separation” is inherent, unavoidable, in it.)

I realize that I am working here on the basis of an argument from silence, broadly analogous to the kind of argument I have criticized in those who contend for the presence of 52 Turner asserts that, “while it is clear that Nephi and his successors taught the people of Christ, there is no textual evidence that the early Nephites had an ecclesiastical organization independent of that associated with the law of Moses.” Ibid, 120, n. 5. However, many important features of the “ecclesiastical organization . . . associated with the law of Moses” themselves appear to be lacking in the Book of Mormon. There seem, for instance, to have been no Levites in the New World. (This fact is noted by Smith, Answers to Gospel Questions, 1:124.)

Peterson, Authority in the Book of Mosiah

"unmediated" priesthood callings in the Book of Mormon. Readers are therefore free to take it for what they think it is worth. One way of testing it will be by the plausibility, or lack thereof, of my overall position, in which this particular argument has a specific place. But I must say that the lack of references to an early Nephite church—consistent over many pages and the space of many years, but only in a particular portion of the record—seems to me more likely to be indicative of something significant than is the occasional failure, in a book nowhere prone to giving biographical details, to mention personal ordinations to the priesthood.

It is Alma who founded the church among the Nephites (Mosiah 23:16), in the sense of a separately existing organization within the larger society. It is easy to see why this was so. The king, Noah, had abdicated his traditional responsibilities in the hierarchical social system of the Nephites, and Alma had taken his place as the spiritual leader and fount of priesthood authority for those who dissented from Noah’s leadership. Alma’s colony thus became a secessionist group much like the almost precisely contemporary community of Qumran on the shore of the Dead Sea.\(^{54}\) Birth as a Nephite was no longer enough to make a man or woman one of God’s people, as it was emphatically no longer sufficient for the Qumran sectaries. Instead, a conscious and personal decision, a covenant, was required of anyone who wished to be numbered among the people of God.

For Alma and his followers, this decision was expressed in baptism.\(^{55}\) “Now,” Alma cried out to his people, “I say unto you, if this be the desire of your hearts, what have ye against being baptized in the name of the Lord, as a witness before him that ye have entered into a covenant with him, that ye will serve him and keep his commandments, that he may pour out his Spirit more abundantly upon you? . . . And they were called the church of God, or the church of Christ, from that time forward. And it came to pass that whosoever was baptized by the power and authority of God was added to his church” (Mosiah 18:10,

Even Alma received immersion as a sign of his commitment to the Lord (Mosiah 18:4-5). At a slightly later time, king Limhi and his people also desired baptism as an expression of their commitment to do the will of God. But “they did not at that time form themselves into a church” because “there was none in the land that had authority from God.” After all, Alma had already fled, as had the wicked but validly ordained priests of Noah. Noah himself was dead, and under such circumstances that he had not managed to “consecrate” Limhi his successor according to Nephite practice. (Ammon, the warrior from Zarahemla who had led the expedition to find them, evidently had priesthood authority, but felt himself unworthy to exercise it and declined to perform the ordinance of baptism for them. See, on all of this, Mosiah 21:33-35.) Later, when the groups led by Alma and Limhi were reunited in Zarahemla, Limhi’s people were baptized by Alma. “Yea, and as many as he did baptize did belong to the church of God” (Mosiah 25:17-18).

It would be foolish, of course, to argue that baptism was unknown among the Nephites before the time of Alma. References to baptism are not uncommon in the small plates. Indeed, Moses 6:52-53, 64 informs us that the ordinance was known to Adam. But it is noteworthy that, while baptism is said to “fulfill all righteousness,” to open the gate for salvation, and to enable us to obtain a remission of sins, no text in the small plates describes baptism as an initiatory rite for entrance into a church, anymore than in the case of Adam. It is also important to bear in mind the fact that church and priesthood are not inseparably linked. It is possible for priesthood to exist without a church (although it is impossible for the true church to exist without priesthood). The Church today, as has often been noted, is simply the essential but temporary scaffolding which surrounds an eternal family-priesthood structure in the process of construction; until that construction is complete at 56 It should be noted here that there is no apparent explanation of what baptism is. Perhaps Alma’s people had already been baptized. Perhaps this represented a rebaptism expressive of recommitment, somewhat along the lines of the rebaptisms performed during the so-called “Mormon reformation” in early Utah. Alma’s immersion of himself may strike us as a bit strange, but it is not incomprehensible. John the Baptist ordained both Oliver Cowdery and Joseph Smith, who then baptized each other with the authority they each had received. Among Alma’s people, only he had such authority.

57 Again, this point is very telling. Obviously, Limhi did not buy the notion of “unmediated” callings.

58 Widtsoe, Evidences and Reconciliations, 177, allows for the possibility that priesthood can exist independently of a church; after all, priesthood authority is necessarily prior to any divinely approved ecclesiastical organization.
some point in the postmortal future, priesthood is mediated through and associated with the Church. Second Nephi 31:9, 18 makes it clear that baptism was known and practiced by the early Nephites, in accordance with eternal law, as the first step on the path toward eternal life. It is not clear what kind of religious society or church community, if any, one joined by those early baptisms. It is not self-evident, in fact, that baptism has always signified entrance into a church, or that entrance to a church has always been a part of that path.59

As a working hypothesis, to be tested by readers and students of the Book of Mormon, I would suggest that early Nephite priesthood was mediated and given structure through family and clan organization, rather than through a church structure. Furthermore, I propose that the early Nephites found their primary social and religious identification in the very fact that they were Nephites. In the earliest days of the Nephites in the New World, to follow Nephi had required a deliberate commitment which might demand sacrifice of those who made it. Baptism was preached and, indeed, stressed to these early Nephites as something pleasing to God and necessary for salvation in his kingdom—but it would be as easy for an unbaptized Nephite to still think of himself as a member of God’s people (albeit one who had not yet gotten around to an important ordinance) as it is easy for some Latter-day Saints today to feel themselves members of the Church, and even believing members, even if they do neglect sacrament services, drink coffee, smoke, and marry outside the temple. Eventually, however, it became apparent that being a Nephite could become, and for many perhaps had become, merely a matter of lineage, and therefore that it need involve no deliberate personal commitment to serve the Lord. It was obvious that the Nephites, as such, were not “the Lord’s people.” A more precise definition of that term, and a marker for who was to be counted among the Lord’s people and who was not, became something desirable.

59 What church did Adam join by receiving the baptism recorded in Moses 7? Having made my point, it is vital that I not be misunderstood: I do not mean to imply that eternal life is available without the ordinances of the priesthood, and I do not mean to suggest for a moment that those ordinances are available or valid in this dispensation apart from The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. John A. Widtsoe, having observed that the priesthood can exist apart from an ecclesiastical organization, and that it has on occasion done so, declared nonetheless that, “whenever the Church exists, any and every person who holds the Priesthood must exercise his power under the laws and authority of the Church. Then, no Priesthood power is recognized on earth outside of the Church” (Widtsoe, Evidences and Reconciliations, 177-78). I fully agree. I have no intention of offering aid or comfort to schismatics and religious free-lancers.
In any event, the “church,” that innovation indirectly brought about by king Noah in the land of Nephi, maintained its separate existence in the land of Zarahemla. King Mosiah granted to Alma the right to “establish churches throughout all the land of Zarahemla,” and authorized him “to ordain priests and teachers over every church” (Mosiah 25:19)—a prerogative heretofore pertaining to the kingship. Indeed, Mosiah gave Alma authority over the church (Mosiah 26:8), thus effectively delegating to another man a major portion of the sacral authority which had traditionally been attached to the Nephite throne. (In what follows, we shall see that Mosiah had felt himself overburdened by the responsibilities he bore as king. He was presumably quite happy to divest himself of some of them.) Priests in the church at Zarahemla taught the people what they received from Alma to teach (Mosiah 25:21), he having received it in his turn from God, whom he represented. Thus, the pyramidal hierarchy of heavenly king, earthly king, priests, teachers, and people, so characteristic of earlier Nephite thought and practice, survived under the new order, albeit in somewhat different form.

It is true that king Mosiah seems to have retained to himself a council of priest-advisors even after the establishment of the church at Zarahemla (Mosiah 27:1). While it is possible that these men continued as a body of priests independent of the new church—the transition from a nonecclesiastical to an ecclesiastical priesthood structure does not need to have occurred all at once, or with absolute neatness—there is no compelling reason to assume that they did. If the virtually universal pattern of advanced cultures in the ancient world held for the Nephites as well, their priesthood would represent many of the best educated and most astute men in the society, and would be a natural reservoir of talented advisors for the monarch. There would be no reason, even after the establishment of the church, for king Mosiah to dismiss his council of advisors, regardless of their priestly status. And, indeed, it is noteworthy that the issue upon which they advise him, according to Mosiah 26:38-27:2, is a political matter transcending the church and extending, in fact, to all

60 The overall organization was called the “church,” but it was made up of subordinate local units also called “churches.” (There were seven of these local units in Zarahemla itself. See Mosiah 25:20-23.)

61 Or to those lineage, family, or clan leaders, in the earliest days, who effectively functioned as kings—as is clearly the case with Nephi. See 2 Nephi 5:18, 26; 6:2. Nevertheless, Rodney Turner’s point is well taken: “Although Mosiah granted Alma the legal right” to organize churches in Zarahemla, “it is evident . . . that Alma had not received his original authority from that prophet-king.” Turner, “The Three Nephite Churches of Christ,” 106.

subjects of the king whether member or not. The king retained authority and responsibility for dealing with such issues.

Questions of ecclesiastical discipline, however, were now to be handled within the organization itself, without the direct involvement of the monarchy. But the establishment of a church within Nephite society, membership in which was both theoretically and practically distinguishable from simple Nephite nationality, led to unprecedented problems.\textsuperscript{63} For one thing, some of the younger generation—those who had not experienced the great spiritual outpouring which occurred at the abdication sermon of king Benjamin, now perhaps more than two decades in the past—refused to be baptized or to join the church (Mosiah 26:1-5).\textsuperscript{64} Their worldly influence, in turn, began to take its toll on those who had already enrolled themselves as members of the church, which was itself well into its second generation. These members of the church began to commit “many sins,” which obviously raised the issue of whether and how they were to be disciplined (see Mosiah 26:6-8).\textsuperscript{65}

\textsuperscript{63} In addition to the problem discussed in the main text, it might be noted that the only references to a historically existent “priestcraft” in the entire Book of Mormon occur in Alma 1 (at 1:12, 16), immediately following organization of a separately existing “church.” As Alma the Younger put it to Nehor, “Behold, this is the first time that priestcraft has been introduced among this people.” Nephi, in 2 Nephi 26:29, had defined the offence, saying that “priestcrafts are that men preach and set themselves up for a light unto the world, that they may get gain and praise of the world.” Perhaps the reason that it occurred now was that, in contrast to the earlier Nephite system, where kings (who, by virtue of their very rank, had no lack of glory or, presumably, of such wealth as was available to Nephites) presided over the priesthood, separation of priesthood from lineage-based leadership now opened up the “ecclesiastical” route to power, glory, and success for people who would otherwise not have had access to it. Recent events in televangelism have shown how well religion can serve as a route to advancement, even for those with no great endowment of wealth or education to begin with.

\textsuperscript{64} This fact shows, implicitly, that the “church” at Zarahemla was meant for all of the inhabitants of that place, and not merely for the refugees from the land of Nephi. Organization of the church by Mosiah and Alma represented a major restructuring of Zarahemlan society.

\textsuperscript{65} In a community of intention, as the church was, one had to ask just how seriously one could sin before it became obvious that his intention to serve God had ceased to exist. And if that intention was gone, could he any longer be validly considered a member of that community? (This was very much a question in early Islam. Did serious sins in and of themselves cause someone to cease to be a Muslim? Was faith alone enough? What of works?) Such questions would not arise where simple Nephite citizenship constituted one a member of the people of God, without personal decision.
“Now there had not any such thing happened before in the church; therefore Alma was troubled in his spirit, and he caused that they should be brought before the king. And he said unto the king: Behold, here are many whom we have brought before thee, who are accused of their brethren; yea, and they have been taken in divers iniquities. And they do not repent of their iniquities; therefore we have brought them before thee, that thou mayest judge them according to their crimes” (Mosiah 26:10-11).

Old habits die hard. Here, Alma—he of the pronounced antimonarchical views—turns to the monarch for assistance in solving a grievous ecclesiastical problem. But he had miscalculated his man, for king Mosiah II himself was probably Alma’s greatest convert to the antimonarchical position. And, at least in this instance, Mosiah was a more consistent partisan of that stance than was the high priest. He refused to become involved in the kind of religious-ecclesiastical issue that he had put onto Alma’s shoulders. “Behold,” he said, “I judge them not; therefore I deliver them into thy hands to be judged” (Mosiah 26:12; emphasis added).

This was extremely troubling to Alma, who saw now no recourse but to approach the Lord in prayer for a solution to the pressing problem facing him. (See Mosiah 26:13. The earthly king, who, in earlier Nephite tradition, had been the fount of religious authority and the last resort for religious questions, had definitively given up such a role. Only the heavenly king was left.) In answer to Alma’s earnest entreaties, the Lord revealed the idea of excommunication, whereby “whosoever will not repent of his sins the same shall not be numbered among my people” (Mosiah 26:32).66 Put into practice, this idea resulted in the “blotting out” of the names of a number of erstwhile adherents of the gospel. “And it came to pass that Alma did regulate all the affairs of the church” (see Mosiah 26:32, 36-37). This idea of excommunication was obviously wholly new to Alma, who had grown up under the old ideology where one’s birth “numbered” one among the people of the Lord—the Nephites—in a way which could not be “blotted out,” and where one’s primary social identity was national or genealogical rather than, as we might express it, “intentional” or “voluntary.”67

66 It has been suggested to me that Mosiah 5:8-12 contains the notion of excommunication. But this passage seems rather to refer to events of the postmortal judgment, i.e., not to excommunication from an earthly church but to the even more serious, indeed spiritually fatal, “excommunication” from the Lord’s presence.

67 Many Nephites apparently continued to see themselves as the Lord’s chosen people purely on the basis of their genealogy—and the Lord clearly continued to reject such a self-congratulatory attitude. Note, for example, the drumbeat of warning sounded against “this people,” the Nephites (repeated over and over
Of Kings and Priests

When it became clear that none of his sons would accept the kingship, Mosiah proposed the abolition of Nephite monarchy— in language strongly reminiscent of Alma’s own position:

If it were possible that you could have just men to be your kings, who would establish the laws of God, and judge this people according to his commandments, yea, if ye could have men for your kings who would do even as my father Benjamin did for this people—I say unto you, if this could always be the case then it would be expedient that ye should always have kings to rule over you. . . . Now I say unto you, that because all men are not just it is not expedient that ye should have a king or kings to rule over you. For behold, how much iniquity doth one wicked king cause to be committed, yea, and what great destruction! Yea, remember king Noah, his wickedness and his abominations, and also the wickedness and abominations of his people. Behold what great destruction did come upon them (Mosiah 29:13, 16-18; cf 29:30-31).

The example of king Noah is surely a clue that Alma’s experiences and Alma’s analysis of the events at the land of Nephi had been deeply influential, if not decisive, for Mosiah’s new position.

Like Alma, Mosiah talks about monarchy from the perspective of human equality. But, although the two men may superficially seem to be saying much the same thing, there is a fundamental difference between their two positions. “I command you,” Mosiah says, that ye have no king; that if these people commit sins and iniquities they shall be answered upon their own heads. For behold I say unto you, the sins of many people have been caused by the iniquities of their kings; therefore their iniquities are answered upon the heads of their kings. And now I desire that this inequality should be no more in this land, especially among this my people. . . . And many more things did king Mosiah write unto them, unfolding unto them all the trials and troubles of a righteous king, yea, all the travails of soul for their people, and also all the murmurings of the people to their king; and he explained it all unto them. And he told them that these things ought not to be; but that the again, clearly with deliberate intent), by Samuel the Lamanite at Helaman 13:5-6. Hope is held out only for “his people” (meaning Christ’s; emphasis added)—who are not necessarily the same group.

68 It might be thought that Mosiah’s decision to abolish the monarchy came simply because there was no one in his family who would accept it, and that he had no choice. In fact, however, his sons’ decision to forego their hereditary rights gave him opportunity for a choice which he on his own did not entirely have the right to make. When the decision was his alone, he could act on his principles, without fear of defrauding his princely sons.
burden should come upon all the people, that every man might bear his part. (Mosiah 29:30-34)

Where the nonroyal Alma had expressed his antimonarchical sentiments in much the same terms which we today would employ, with our insistence on human rights and the equality of all humanity before God and the law, Mosiah comes to the question from the king’s perspective. (His approach is very unlike the nineteenth-century American thinking that some critics of the Book of Mormon claim to see in it.) Mosiah worries about the undue burden which kingship imposes even on those who conscientiously strive to carry out their responsibilities. Having attempted for more than three decades to discharge his royal duties well, Mosiah feels that it is the king who is victimized by the inequality inherent in the Nephite monarchical system. The ruler carries not only his own mistakes, but risks responsibility for those of his subjects if he has in any way, even inadvertently, misled them.

Mosiah’s concerns are true to life. Similar views are expressed by both king and commons in Shakespeare’s historical play about The Life of King Henry V. On the eve of the momentous battle of Agincourt (1415), Henry, unable to sleep, is depicted as wandering among his heavily outnumbered troops, disguised as a common soldier. He engages some of his men in conversation, but is not entirely prepared for what he hears:

\begin{align*} \text{BATES} \\
\text{If his cause be wrong, our obedience to the king wipes the crime of it out of us.} \\
\text{WILLIAMS} \\
\text{But if the cause be not good, the king himself hath a heavy reckoning to make, when all those legs and arms and heads, chopped off in a battle, shall join together at the latter day and cry all 'We died at such a place; some swearing, some crying for a surgeon, some upon their wives left poor behind them, some upon the debts they owe, some upon their children rawly left. ... Now, if these men do not die well, it will be a black matter for the king that led them to it.}
\end{align*}

Understandably, Henry is deeply troubled by this kind of talk, and attempts without great success (while still concealing his identity) to argue against it. He does not manage, it seems, even to convince himself, and after his men have gone off to sleep we see him among the slumbering soldiers and speaking somewhat bitterly to himself of his envy for their simple lives, so free of responsibility:

69 What volumes this speaks for the character of Mosiah III! (especially in contrast to king Noah).
The king was clearly worried, too, about the potential threat which the continued existence of the monarchy might pose to his heir (see Mosiah 29:6-9).

70 The Life of Henry V, act 4, scene 1, lines 138-52.
Upon the king! let us our lives, our souls,
Our debts, our careful wives,
Our children and our sins lay on the king!
We must bear all. O hard condition,
Twin-born with greatness, subject to the breath
Of every fool, whose sense no more can feel
But his own wringing! What infinite heart’s-ease
Must kings neglect, that private men enjoy!
And what have kings, that privates have not too,
Save ceremony, save general ceremony?
And what art thou, thou idol ceremony?
What kind of god art thou, that suffer’st more
Of mortal griefs than do thy worshippers?

Wherein thou art less happy being fear’d
Than they in fearing.

... No, thou proud dream,
That play’st so subtly with a king’s repose;
I am a king that find thee, and I know
’Tis not the balm, the sceptre and the ball,
The sword, the mace, the crown imperial,
The intertissued robe of gold and pearl,
The farced title running ‘fore the king,
The throne he sits on, nor the tide of pomp
That beats upon the high shore of this world,
No, not all these, thrice-gorgeous ceremony,
Not all these, laid in bed majestical,
Can sleep so soundly as the wretched slave,
Who with a body fill’d and vacant mind
Gets him to rest...
The slave, a member of the country’s peace,
Enjoys it; but in gross brain little wots
What watch the king keeps to maintain the peace,
Whose hours the peasant best advantages.71

71 Ibid., act 4, scene 1, lines 247-301. Shakespeare’s Henry is acutely aware that the king, although burdened with more than ordinary responsibility, is merely a man. Thus, in lines 105-14 of the same act and scene, his ironic words (he is still disguised as a commoner) convey a serious point: “I think the king is but a man, as I am: the violet smells to him as it doth to me; the element shows to him as it doth to me; all his senses have but human conditions: his ceremonies laid by, in his nakedness he appears but a man; and though his affections are higher mounted than ours, yet, when they stoop, they stoop with the like wing. Therefore when he sees reason of fears, as we do, his fears, out of doubt, be of the same relish as ours are.” Compare the sentiments expressed by king Benjamin, the father of Mosiah II, at Mosiah 2:10-11: “I have not commanded you to come up hither that ye should fear me, or that ye should think that I of myself am more than a mortal man. But I am like as yourselves, subject to all manner of infirmities in body and mind; yet I have been chosen by this people, and consecrated by my father, and was suffered by the hand of the Lord
These are, whether regarded as Henry’s or as Shakespeare’s, utterly pre-democratic sentiments. So, too, are those of king Mosiah, although we can certainly understand how a reigning monarch might be inclined toward monarchical thoughts!

Perhaps Mosiah recalled the fate of Noah, who paid for his crimes with a very painful death while his people seem to have been spared. (Though an evil man, Noah was nonetheless a king, a member of a small and quite select fraternity. In this limited but not unimportant respect, Mosiah could probably feel some kinship with him.) Perhaps Mosiah remembered the words of his father Benjamin, spoken at the end of a long, conscientious, and laborious reign devoted to the service of his fellowmen and thus to the service of God: “I say unto you that if ye should serve him who has created you . . . . I say, if ye should serve him with all your whole souls yet ye would be unprofitable servants” (see Mosiah 2:21; cf. 2:17).

Moved by Mosiah’s obviously deep feelings, the people agreed to his plan to abolish the monarchy. “Therefore they relinquished their desires for a king, and became exceedingly anxious that every man [even those of royal blood] should have an equal chance throughout all the land; yea, and every man expressed a willingness to answer for his own sins” (Mosiah 29:38).

So the relatively secular institution of the “judgeship” was introduced among and accepted by the Nephites (Mosiah 29:11, 41-42), to complement the religious office of “high priest” which had already been introduced. (In a certain sense, this merely formalized the division of functions which Mosiah and Alma had already worked out some time before.) However, the people chose as their first chief judge Alma the Younger, who had previously received the office of high priest from his father, the first Alma (Mosiah 29:42). Mosiah II having had no willing heirs, this Alma had already received the plates of brass, the records, and the interpreters, the sacred relics which, as we have seen, once formed so important a part of the symbolism of Nephite kingship (Mosiah 28:10, 20). The bestowal of the chief judgeship upon Alma may therefore be plausibly read as an attempt on the part of the people to recombine the secular and sacred functions of the kingship in one man, who might, it is true, not bear the title of “king” but would nonetheless serve essentially the same role. Kingship had, after all, been a rather popular institution. Nephi’s brothers had thought that he coveted the title (1 Nephi 16:38), and he had later been obliged to refuse it from his people (2 Nephi 5:18; 6:2). Zeniff was made king by the voice of the people in the land of Nephi (Mosiah 7:9). Alma’s people sought to persuade him to accept kingly honors, but he refused (Mosiah 23:6-7). And it was only after Mosiah’s passionate appeal to his people that “they relinquished their desires for a king” (Mosiah 29:38). Furthermore, the monarchy continued to fascinate and attract portions, at least, of the Nephite population long after its abolition, as is shown by repeated efforts through the years to effect its restoration. Alma 51-62, for instance, records the struggles Moroni had with the so-called “king-men,” who sought to alter the laws in order to reestablish kingship. Third Nephi 6:30 alludes to yet another attempt to put a king on a Nephite throne, and 3 Nephi 7:9-10 describes an effort which was partially and temporarily successful in doing just that. Obviously, kingship had its appeal—and not only to the lucky one who would, if successful, gain the throne.

The apparent attempt of the Nephite people to circumvent their king’s rejection of kingship did not, however, succeed. After only about five years, Alma the Younger gave up his position as chief judge (presumably the least effective of his two offices) in order to concentrate his attention upon the high priesthood as the solution for the urgent problems which faced his people (Alma 4:15-20). Never again would a Nephite king serve as both religious and temporal leader of his people. The relatively secular office of the chief judgeship would continue almost to the end of Nephite civilization, but we have no record of any chief judge ever ordaining priests; such ordinations were the prerogative of the high priests before the coming of Christ (as at Alma 6:1; 3 Nephi 7:25),73 and then, after the coming of Christ and the apparent disappearance of that office, of the “disciples or elders of the church” (Moroni 3:1).74 Priesthood functions were essentially severed from governmental functions, and the two would never be fully recombined in the sacral kingship with which Nephite history had begun in the New World. The material objects which had once pertained to the Nephite monarchy continued to be passed down, but now along a nonroyal line of high priests and prophets (Alma 37:1-47; 63:1-2, 10-13; 3 Nephi 1:2-3; 4 Nephi 1:47-49; Mormon 1:2-5; 4:23; 8:3-5; Moroni 10:2; Joseph Smith-History).

73 Ammon, Aaron, Omner, and Himni—the four sons of Mosiah II—consecrated priests among the Lamanites (Alma 23:4), but there is no reason, despite their absence of fourteen years (Alma 17:4), to suppose that they did so independent of the priesthood authority resident in the Nephite church. Later, Ammon at least appears as an ecclesiastical subordinate to Alma the Younger (Alma 30:20, 30).

74 The office of high priest is not mentioned later than 3 Nephi 6:21-22, 27, by which time it has clearly become corrupt.
This brief glance at the question of priesthood and authority in the book of Mosiah has revealed an intricately complex and remarkably consistent system underlying the many incidental details of its already highly involved narrative. I do not see how anyone can fail to be impressed with what the book of Mosiah discloses about the nuanced richness of the Book of Mormon. I certainly have been.
